

Siya, Strand 01 -- What the Fund Is For

Stamp: STAMP -- taken from the one clock at seating, never typed by counsel

Language: EN

Style: New Gauge, Door setting -- Civic (name what the reward measures) and TAME (bound every claim, say why), in plain words for Sara and Keaton

Voice: Kyri (Grain Kyri 6) -- Claude Fable 5, counsel to Siya Fund

Shape: single-stranded -- this document is about one thing and stands free of the others; the composed reading lives in Siya, composed

Status: Living -- a foundation. Nothing here is investment, legal, or tax advice; nothing seats; every money move waits behind the gates in Strand 10 and the licensed team

Field only: this strand names the family; the seed projector withholds it

The one thing this strand holds: Siya exists to turn a family's money into good the family can prove, and every later decision is measured against that.

Start at the table

A family has money it did not earn this year. Some of it came as an inheritance, and most of it sits as shares in listed companies, about USD 2.5 million as of this summer. Money that sits still does two things. It waits, and it slowly loses ground to prices that rise a little every year. So the first question is the plain one: what is this money for?

A fund is the answer to that question written down. It is a basket with a name, a purpose, and rules, so the money can move on purpose rather than by accident. Siya is the family's basket. Sara is its chief executive. Keaton is its founder, its technologist, its finance officer, and its creative director. Two people, one basket, decisions made together and recorded where both can read them.

Every basket rewards something

Here is the idea the whole fund rests on, and it comes from the way this family already thinks about public work. Every system rewards something, whether or not anyone chose it. A basket rewarded only for growing grows for its own sake, and its owners wake up one day serving it. A basket rewarded for a purpose keeps the purpose in view, because the reward and the purpose point the same way.

Siya names its purpose plainly. The family wants to give, to do no harm, and to live by the vegan ethic it already keeps at its own table. Two old words carry that in this house. Seva means service, the work done for others. Ahimsa means doing no harm, and it reaches every living creature. The fund invests so that the giving has something to give from, and it counts a year by what it gave and could prove, beside what it earned.

Proof matters because giving without a record is a story, and a story is hard to check. The family's own software, Linengrow, is being built to carry gifts on a rail that writes a receipt anyone can verify. Siya is the basket that feeds that rail, and the receipt is how the basket keeps itself honest.

What kind of vessel

A fund has a legal shape, and the shape decides three practical things: who pays the tax, who can borrow, and what the directors owe. Two readings stand on the record, and naming both is more useful than pretending there is one.

The first reading came in the elder counsel session of August 2026. It chose a plain limited liability company in Nevada, Siya Fund LLC. That shape is a pane of glass for tax: every gain passes straight through to the two personal returns, and so does a large federal tax gift for early investors in small companies, which Strand 06 explains. It is cheap to keep, about USD 425 to open and USD 350 a year (the elder session's reading).

The second reading runs through the memos written later that month. They name a Wyoming public-benefit company with Sara as chief executive. A public-benefit charter writes the purpose into the company's own law, so a director may weigh the good beside the money and be protected for doing so. It is the shape this family uses for its public work, and it reads well beside the seva the fund is for.

Which vessel Siya is today decides who the lender lends to, how the small-company tax gift flows, and how the charter reads. Counsel holds both readings open. The tax attorney reads them, and Keaton's word seats one. That is a named gap, and a named gap is worth more than a confident guess.

What the fund rewards, plainly

Read the basket the way this family reads a policy. The outcome wanted is good the family can prove. The reward the fund measures is two numbers side by side, what it earned and what it gave with a receipt. Those two stay aligned when the investments themselves are the kind of work the family would be glad to have its name on: ground under an ecological grower, a mill for plant fibre, housing in a working town, a friend's honest company. Strand 07 walks that ground.

What stands, and what is proposed

What stands: the family, the basket, the USD 2.5 million, and the purpose in the family's own words. What is proposed: the vessel, which waits on the attorney and on Keaton's word.

What would show this wrong

A year in which the fund can show earnings and no verified giving. That would mean the reward had slipped away from the purpose, and the fix would be in the rules rather than in anyone's resolve.

Written together by Keaton and Kyri.
